The Ombuds Office
at Washington University School of Medicine
exists to hear and attempt to resolve, both confidentially and informally, work-related concerns and issues of faculty members with appointments at the School of Medicine.
What the Ombuds Office Can Do

The mission of the Office is to provide a confidential place for faculty members to voice concerns, acquire information, and consider ways to solve problems. The Ombuds listens and may suggest various options, both informal and formal, for responding to or resolving concerns, complaints, or disputes. The Ombuds may offer communications coaching or may help in drafting a letter if that seems appropriate. With your permission, the Ombuds may make informal inquiries on your behalf, collect data or gather the perspectives of others in similar circumstances. The Ombuds may suggest referrals to other University offices or, with your permission, serve in the capacity of mediator. The Ombuds also provides information to University officials, including the Executive Committee of the Faculty Council, on general trends and patterns of complaints to prevent such problems from escalating or recurring.

What Concerns Come to the Office?

Ombuds offices commonly listen to concerns that may be unpleasant personally, that interfere with productive work, or that raise ethical or legal questions. Concerns or issues may involve co-workers or team members, senior or junior colleagues, supervisors or subordinates. Interpersonal differences, communication problems, authorship issues, and conflicts of interest are not uncommon. Perceived discrimination, unfair treatment, and lack of appropriate recognition illustrate concerns that may lead to a visit with the Ombuds.

Who We Are

The Ombuds Office is staffed by two long time members of the University community. The primary Ombuds is Karen O'Malley, Professor of Neurobiology. Her associate is Jeff Lowell, Professor of Surgery and Pediatrics. Appointments may be made with either.

Our Independence

The Ombuds Office is not associated with any other University office. It is not a part of and does not report to Human Resources, General Counsel or the Executive Faculty. We were appointed to our positions by the Dean of the School of Medicine but we are not part of that office.

What the Ombuds Office Cannot Do

The Ombuds cannot receive notice on behalf of the University or require any person at the University to take action to resolve issues brought to the Ombuds’ attention. The Ombuds Office cannot give you legal advice, nor can it testify on your behalf in legal proceedings. The Ombuds Office cannot take part in formal appeal or grievance procedures; it will not undertake formal investigations; and it cannot become involved in a case if formal proceedings have already begun. The Office will try to find answers to questions and in doing so may undertake informal inquiries to the extent that it has your permission. Because the Ombuds Office maintains a neutral position, it cannot serve as an advocate, although it can provide constructive and supportive advice.
